David Jones, on leave from the Royal Shakespeare Company, has directed [the play] without flamboyance and with an acute sense of where the play's real strength lies. It is not in the young people, despite all their activity, but in the old ones: King Louis, and above all, the Countess Rousillon, Bertram's mother. With Tanya Moiseiwitsch as designer, a lovely autumnal scene has been devised. A gardener—Lavache, a muted clown—sweeps dead leaves away from a sundial. He chews on a green leaf. Time is the setting for the appearance of the Countess, who is probably the finest old woman that Shakespeare has created. She is a figure of some majesty. The widow of a great lord, she has lived through her passions and is left with her position. And in the play we see her living through that as well. She grows younger and more free. Helena's love for Bertram strikes her at first as a revolution, but she sees that new life must replenish old power, and she embraces her daughter-in-law long before Bertram does. She is acted by the finest performer to be seen so far at the festival. Margaret Tyzack, a British actress who has worked with the Royal Shakespeare Company and on television, plays old age as if it were a higher form of life. She can be motionless and still move. When she questions Helena about her feelings for Bertram she begins with severity. She is trying to find out the truth, and she is trying to work out what the truth will do to her. Suddenly we know: the two lips have been compressed in a straight line; the upper lip draws in almost imperceptibly, and the grimness is flooded by compassion. William Hutt, the Stratford veteran, is an intelligent actor, perhaps rather than a great one. But the intelligence works beautifully: King Louis does not have the profundity of the Countess. There are comedy and sharpness in Mr. Hutt's old king. Helena approaches him with her promise of a cure. He is pale, swollen, lethargic, dressed in a voluminous gray silk bathrobe that looks like defeat itself. He has made up his mind that he is incurable. As she cajoles him from the left side, his head retreats suspiciously to the right. A few minutes later, having submitted to the medicines, he emerges dancing a feeble but lively gavotte. Martha Henry is industrious in an industrious part. It is a vigorous performance, rather than a particularly moving one... The other players are less interesting. Nicholas Pennell is an unsatisfactory Bertram and Richard Monette doesn't accomplish much in the vacuous role of Parolles—a feeble version of Pistol in Henry V. Leslie Yeo has good moments as Lafeu whose sententiousness is a mask for a kind heart and a growing wisdom. (Richard Eder, New York Times, 9 June 1977)

Russet brown, autumnal, Chekhovian was the unbreakable chain of association this production established. The costumes, early seventeenth century, confirmed the mood, and I remembered Lila de Nobili's Caroline Twelfth Night for Peter Hall. Given the opening chord, the major parts were predictable and logical. Few actresses impart wisdom so well as Margaret Tyzack, and her sympathetic, dignified Countess of Rossillion was deeply moving. William Hutt's bathrobed king moved surely from elegant listlessness to the animation of his lecture. Richard Monette played Parolles for easy-going charm, an affable enough fellow with no real vice in him. These were straightforward projections; and Martha Henry continued the approach with a Helena overwhelmed by passion... There were no Shavian hints here. Nicholas Pennell resisted the general wholesomeness, but he located a certain charm in Bertram, and his final "If she, my liege, can make me know this clearly, / I'll love her dearly, ever, ever dearly" seemed without reservation. A happy end, then, that took the title at face value. But in this concept there is no place for Lavatch the bitter fool; he became simply the gardener/retainer, grumbling about the goings-on in the manor. For all its individual excellences, therefore, especially the Florentine camp scenes, I found the production unsatisfying. All's Well is a seedy, seamy affair, and David Jones resolutely turned his back on the blacker elements of the play. (Ralph Berry, Shakespeare Quarterly 29 [1978]: 222–26)

Opening Date 17 July 1982	Director Richard Cottrell

This is an eccentric All's Well, set in the 1930s with soldiers dressed like French partisans mouthing fustian "quoths" and "what hos." Seana McKenna as Diana ... is dressed like Edith Piaf, down to and including a microphone and an upbeat arrangement of one of Shakespeare's "hey nonny no" songs from another play ... The strengths and weaknesses of this year's company as seen in Midsummer were shown in a different light in All's Well. Nicky Guadagni, whose Titania was the highlight of Midsummer, appears uneasy as the elderly mother to McKenna's Diana, resorting to an assortment of technique tricks. But then, it is a small role without space for fleshing out. Cheryl Swarts, who was interesting in the earlier production, has a virtual walk-on here. And Kieron Jecchinis, who was an interesting Puck, does nothing special with the role of Lavatch. On the other hand, Diego Matamoros (whose Lysander on Friday was all right but not inspiring) really hits his stride as Parolles, the cowardly dandy who helps persuade Bertram to abandon the devoted Helena. And Sean McKenna, who was rather showy and hollow in Midsummer, is a considerably affecting Diana ... Charmion King once again turned in a classy and assured performance as the Countess of Rossillion. The other veterans are unimposing, in fact, asleep on their feet. The only exception is Fiona Reid as Helena, who is working altogether too hard at the verse, with a distracting sing-song quality. If only she would relax and let a hint of irony penetrate the inexorable breathlessness of her delivery. Most of the other performances were unremarkable, as was the production itself. All's Well is a difficult play that can work only with a faultless cast. (Ray Conlogue, Globe and Mail, 19 July 1982)

Opening Date 18 May 1988	Designer Christina Poddubiuk
Venue Avon Theatre, Stratford, ON	Lighting Harry Frehner
Company Stratford Shakespeare Festival	Music Raymond Pannell
Director Peter Moss

All's Well was handsomely set in the Civil War South, a milieu that reflected the elegiac, autumnal mood of the play, its martial background, and its concerns with class conflict and honor. Classic Revival porticoes draped in Spanish Moss, groups of Confederate soldiers limping wearily home from battle or huddled in their mist-enshrouded night camps, and fancy dress cotillions were, however, images much too familiar to dissociate from a specific time and place... [T]hey evoked not so much the mythic, archetypal world of All's Well That Ends Well as that of Gone With the Wind. Moreover, perhaps because of the attention given to historical costumes and striking visual impression, the problematic relationship of Helena and Bertram seemed secondary rather than central in this production. Neither characterization was particularly insightful or distinctive. Nigel Hamer's Bertram was a handsome but self-indulgent, rather ordinary young man. One wondered, apart from his good looks, what Helena saw in him. Lucy Peacock's Helena, wearing horn-rimmed glasses at her entrance, was attractively modest and winningly intelligent and witty, but her portrayal lacked psychological depth and complexity. Helena's almost obsessional attraction to Bertram remained enigmatic. Bernard Hopkins's vivid Parolles was the dominant performance. Taking his cue from Lafeu's comment that the "soul of this man is his clothes" (2.5.44–45), Hopkins played him as a bloated, blustering, overdressed Victorian dandy, part John Bull, part Falstaff, and part Il Capitano. At the court, he swaggered about in a resplendent Hussar's dress uniform. It seemed appropriate that in the scene of his unmasking, he was literally stripped of his fancy clothes and even of his shiny, black toupee and appeared in long johns and girdle, a contemptible, ridiculous figure. (Daniel J. Watermeier, Shakespeare Quarterly 40 [1989]: 216–17)

An echo of Gone With The Wind is plainly intended, although Moss has been wise enough not to insist on too many parallels. The only one he is after is the similarity of Bertram to Rhett Butler: a disdainful, womanizing hero who torments the true love of the heroine. It doesn't work, alas. The chief difficulty of the play remains: that

Bertram is an unredeemed jerk who marries Helena and then meanly refuses to spend even a night with her, taking quick flight with a commission to the Tuscan wars. Even though she is beautiful she repels him, for reasons Shakespeare doesn't trouble to explain. When, after many adventures, he finally agrees to be a husband to her, his love is declared in two scrawny and unconvincing lines of poetry. There is no helpful parallel between Helena and Scarlett O'Hara. Helena is beautiful, sweet-tempered and virtuous, so opposite to Bertram that there is no convincing psychological reason for her to love him ... Directors have tried many different approaches to the play. Moss, thankfully, has not burlesqued it. The King is presented with dignity and verisimilitude, especially in the masterly performance of that very experienced actor, Joseph Shaw. Helena's protector, the Countess, is played with caring and thoughtfulness by Susan Wright ... As with Joseph Shaw's King, the other strong performances of the evening emerge from veteran actors well schooled in Shakespeare's more difficult reaches. Bernard Hopkins, especially, makes a rich meal of Parolles, the braid-bedecked phony soldier who attaches himself as a parasite to Bertram. He is played as a fat and breathless little man, to make it more obvious that he cannot possibly be the battlefield terror he says he is; and his lines, especially his remarkable speech of self-recognition when he is exposed as a fraud, are delivered with the kind of creative subtlety so absent in the principal roles. Richard Curnock is likewise quite good as the angry courtier LaFew. Allan Gray shows the potential for rich clowning in his Lavatch, but the role is also a difficult one—is he a figure of romance or would-be realism? Gray avoids the difficulty by delivering the performance, as it were, from outside the rest of the production. Raymond Pannell's music of fife and drum was southern enough to support the Civil War setting but not so literal as to make a mockery of it. (Ray Conlogue, Globe and Mail, 2 June 1988)

As couples kissed one another [at play's end], including Bertram and Helena, the King gave his final speech and the epilogue. That kissing epitomized the interpretation, its emphasis on romance, on the union of the generally admired Helena and the generally forgiven Bertram ... Restoring the king to heath, Helena transformed herself from a plain Jane in black jacket, dark blue skirt, and spectacles into a striking beauty in light, bright gowns that billowed, then settled about her when she curtsied. And Bertram, it seemed, had reformed especially because of the lessons he learned about the true character of the misleader of his youth, Parolles. Illness, aging, death, grief, deceit, meanness were all clearly established by the costumes, sets, music, and songs and by such characters as Lavache, whose bitterness intensified after the supposed death of Helena. Still the comedy transcended them. I have never seen in the Avon Theatre as effective a production of Shakespeare. The platforms on the stage (the first, one or two steps high, creating the impression of a thrust within the proscenium; the second another three steps up and across the back) enhanced the blocking by setting up various spaces, small and large, for the encounters of characters. Huge, simple objects suspended at the back defined locales impressively; a portrait of a mounted soldier for the King's chamber; shutters for Diana's bedroom; many-paned window frames for the Countess of Rossilion's gracious estate. The lighting, enlarging or reducing the playing spaces, reinforced the sense of intimacy or of containment or of roomy congeniality... Helena, Diana, and the King..., framed sharply by spotlights, spoke directly to the audience. And Moss and his cast got the pace just right: the action increased in speed with the letters, news, and travels of characters, and the liveliness intensified with the joke on Parolles so that the finale reached a satisfying climax. All's Well was good theatre. (C. E. McGee, Shakespeare Bulletin 6, nos. 5–6 [1988]: 5–8)
